Less than a year after the publication of the US Federal Reserve's "Principles for Sound Monetary Policy" a majority of the central bank's members responded to a question in the voter survey that asked respondents to assess their level of agreement with that framework. The overall results from the March-April survey were not surprising, with the majority of participants expressing agreement with the Fed's assessment of the economy and, more specifically, the conditions under which it would tolerate higher inflation. Here are the chief results: 81% of respondents said they were either very familiar with the framework or somewhat familiar with it. 88% of respondents who were classified by the Fed as "tight money" or "inflation friendly" said they were either very familiar or somewhat familiar with the framework. Less than 1% of respondents who were classified by the Fed as "easy money" or "fiscal policy in the near future" said they were either very familiar or somewhat familiar with the framework. The Fed's top policymakers — the Fed's Governors and presidents — have not yet specifically commented on the publication of the "Principles" and their survey data. However, last year when the Policy Normalization Framework was first previewed, in response to that initial survey, Timothy F. Geithner, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, stated that the Fed would likely not tolerate high inflation for the next several years. Participants could also agree or disagree with the statement "very high inflation in the next 2 years is likely to occur." Overall, 85% of respondents agreed with that statement. The survey did not address specific monetary policy questions, but as with most surveys it is logical to wonder if there is a relationship between participants' answers on these questions and the answers they gave to the question assessing their level of familiarity with the Fed's "Principles for Sound Monetary Policy." Another question in the survey asked participants about the need for six additional vacant posts on the Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC). Under this scenario, one of the vacant seats would be for a voter and five out of the six would be filled with non-voter members. Overall, 72% of respondents said they felt the need for additional voter members on the FOMC "would be extremely or quite important to making a decision about raising or
